6 December, 1648: Pride's Purge Dr Stephen Roberts , editor of the HOP's House of Commons 1640-60 project, explains the importance of "Pride's Purge" which took place on this day in 1648. Since the victories by the New Model Army which brought the first civil war between Parliament and King Charles I to an end in 1646, relations between the soldiers and their parliamentary employers had been uneasy.

Pride's Purge, 1648 - BCW Project

Pride's Purge left a 'Rump' (as it came to be called) of barely 200 Members. Among these, a determined clique unilaterally forced through an 'Act' on 6 January 1649, establishing a court to try Charles I for high treason - ignoring the negative vote a few days before of the small number of peers still sitting in the Lords.

Prides Purge Politics In The Puritan Revolution

Pride's Purge is the name commonly used for an event that took place on 6 December 1648, when soldiers prevented MPs considered hostile to the New Model Army from entering the House of Commons. Despite defeat in the First English Civil War, Charles I retained significant political power. This allowed him to create an alliance with Scots Covenanters and Parliamentary moderates to restore him to the English throne. The result was the 1648 Second English Civil War, in which he was defeated once a

Rump Parliament. In United Kingdom: Civil war and revolution. Pride's Purge was a last-minute compromise made to prevent absolute military rule. With Cromwell deliberately absent in the north, Ireton was left to stave off the argument, made by the Levelers, that Parliament was hopelessly corrupt and should be dissolved.
